It is simply because the question suggests 'dry' as an intransitive verb, and the answer indicates that it was being used as a transitive noun without specifying an object? Or is there anything else happening here different from 'dry' being both transitive and intransitive? Edit - Typo fixed. dry is obviously a verb,page 2 6 comments once familiar with which puzzles and read a lot so that you will become used to think creatively, you are ready for Write your own enigma. It is best to choose an easy object as the answer first. Choose a family object, like an animal, or a natural phenomenon, like a storm. Decide how long make the puzzle. A short puzzle may be just a few phrases while a longer can be any length you like, as long as it is not too long for your public to focus. The easiest way to write a puzzle is to personify the object you have chosen. For example, consider a yellow pencil with a rubber at the end and think of adjectives and verbs related to it. These can be wood, yellow, pink hat (to describe the rubber), the fact that it looks like the number "1", and that has a number 2 lead 2. Then think of ways to use the object. For example, you sharpen the pencils to continue writing with leadership. Besides, consider what the object does. For example, despite your small size, a pencil writes everything you want. Now think of meters using the list of verbs and adjectives. You need a creative description for your common pencils that is obscure, but eventually leads people to guess that is a pencil. An example of your puzzle for a yellow pencil can be: a golden sword using a pink hat, has two trees, both number 1 and number 2. your puzzle can always read as if the own object is speaking. In this case, your pencil would describe yourself to the public: I am a golden sword using a pink hat, I have two trees, both number 1 and number 2. Use simple rather than elaborate words and say Out loud to assess how it seems to your public. Use rhyme and alliteration to make it more engaging for the public. When you finish composing your puzzle, test your family or friends. If they solve quickly, take a little time to revise it and make it more abstract. If they struggle with it, become a little simpler. simpler.
